The New Forest has existed as woodland since the end of the last Ice Age, and its heaths were first cleared and cultivated in the Bronze Age. There are still many barrows and mounds from the Forest's prehistoric era visible today, but it was only during the Norman Conquest in the 11th century that the area started to take on something of its current shape. The area was previously known as 'Ytene' the land of the Jutes (an Anglo-Saxon tribe), and it was grouped together as a 'new' forest by William the Conqueror in 1079. 'Nova Forest' as it was originally known, did not refer to a forest in the sense of a wooded area, but rather to a protected royal hunting ground, to which specific, often harsh laws applied. Later, in 1217, the Charter of the Forest restored some of the locals' rights, repealing the death penalty for the theft of venison. The laws of the New Forest were protected by the Verderers, and included common rights, some which still exist today; the right to turn out livestock and sheep to pasture, to turn out pigs to forage, and rights to the area's natural resources, including turbary.
