The most common date attributed to the arrival of tobacco in England is 27th July 1586, when it is said Sir Walter Raleigh brought it to England from Virginia. Indeed, one legend tells of how Sir Walter's servant, seeing him smoking a pipe for the first time, threw water over him, fearing him to be on fire. However it is much more likely that tobacco had been around in England long before this date. Tobacco had been smoked by Spanish and Portuguese sailors for many years and it is likely that the habit of pipe smoking had been adopted by British sailors before 1586. Sir John Hawkins and his crew could have brought it to these shores as early as 1565. However when Raleigh arrived back in England in 1586, he brought with him colonists from the settlement on the Roanoke Island, and these colonists brought with them tobacco, maize and potatoes. Rather bizarrely, tobacco was seen as good for your health, whereas potatoes were viewed with great suspicion! The use of tobacco by this time was well known on the Continent. The Spaniard Nicolas Monardes had written a report into tobacco, translated into English by John Frampton in 1577 and called 'Of the Tabaco and of His Greate Vertues', which recommended its use for the relief of toothache.
